6th Annual Directors Training Academy

Continuing Legal Education at Seattle University School of Law

This program is one of many continuing legal education programs sponsored and presented by the Seattle University School of Law to help you increase your understanding of substantive areas of the law, get insight from distinguished speakers, network with colleagues and fulfill mandatory CLE requirements. These programs are developed and presented at the suggestion of, and in cooperation with, prominent Washington and national attorneys and law school professors to help you become a more knowledgeable and effective practitioner.

Few subjects draw more immediate attention or concern than the safety of the food we eat. Recent years have included a plethora of food warnings and recalls, raising new questions about the quality and integrity of our existing system for assuring food safety. Seattle was the epicenter of the Jack in the Box E. coli outbreak that sickened 600 and killed four 15 years ago. In addition to explaining how our present system works, this program is intended to discuss how changing consumer preferences are affecting the development and distribution of food, examine whether Federal, state and industry oversight roles are changing, and discuss how the regulatory and judicial processes can be most efficiently balanced. Participants include national and local representatives of government, the food industry, consumer organizations and scientists.
